Independent Citation Record Guide

To make an independent citation record, go to your Google Scholar profile. For each publication, click on the number of its citations. This will take you to a listing of the citations to the publication. There may be more than one page of citations for some of your publications. You should make PDFs of these pages. On these pages, you should then highlight the title of each independent citation (citations where the citing paper and cited paper share no authors). You should make sure that on each citation page, the title of your article is posted at the top of the page.

For your convenience, we have uploaded a sample independent citation page to Section II of the I-140 RFE tab ("Sample Independent Citation Page.pdf"). For our ease of access, please either consolidate all your citing article lists into a single PDF file, or please upload these PDFs together in an organized .zip folder. Please also include a copy of the Google Scholar profile page displaying your total number of citations at the time of preparing the independent citation record.

For any independent citations that are not listed in English, we should provide a certified English translation (i.e., an English translation and an accompanying translation affidavit). The translation of each entry should list the title of the article, the list of authors, and the venue in which the article was published. You are welcome to complete these translations yourself or get in touch with an individual(s) fluent in both English and the original language to translate the citation(s) on your behalf. If you or a colleague, acquaintance, friend, or family member do the certified translation yourselves, please complete the template we have uploaded to Section II of the I-140 RFE tab ("Translation_Affidavit.docx"). Then, please sign and date it. Otherwise, please have an official translation service complete a certified translation for you.

As an important disclaimer, USCIS does not consider translations conducted by automated translation tools like Google Translate to be "certified." Rather, only the translator himself or herself – a human individual fluent in both the original and translated languages – can certify the accuracy of his or her own translation. Neither Google Translate itself nor a Google Translate user can certify an automated translation. Therefore, you should not perform your own translations using Google Translate. Thank you for understanding.

If you do not wish to obtain certified English translations of the non-English citation entries in your independent citation record, you should refrain from highlighting the non-English citation entries in your citation record and provide us with an adjusted independent citation total and percentage based solely on your English citations. To calculate this adjusted independent citation percentage, you would want to divide your total number of independent citations in English by the total number of English citations indexed on your Google Scholar profile.

In addition, you are welcome to create a pie chart or similar visual aid depicting the breakdown between your independent and dependent citation percentages and totals. If you do this, we recommend dating or timestamping the chart so that it does not need to be continuously updated every time your citations increase. That said, this chart can certainly be updated shortly before we finalize your RFE response, especially if your independent citation percentage improves between now and your final deadline.
